However, I think some changes were made to the behavior of :so % so that this is the preferred behavior in 5.7, as I recall. I would guess that what you are seeing is that the :so command is trying to work out what you want it to do, and so is executing all sorts of function commands to get the correct semantics, even if the result would be different than what you want. I find that it is often easier to use the "i" command, since it automatically inserts the specified file into the current buffer. So, I often type ":so /tmp/foo" and then press enter to get Vim to insert that file into the current file buffer. From there I can use any other Vim commands to work with the file. (By the way, I noticed that you have confirmed that the fix for 5.7 is in place. It is always a good idea to confirm that the fix worked in the updated version before updating the VIM that you are using. You might want to compare :version to the one posted for 5.7-1 to find out if your VIM is actually on the beta version now.) Bill --William R. Smythe wsm at smythe.de
